

Savannah Spotlight

In future issues of The Savannah Newsletter, Hickory White plans to showcase a new piece in the "Savannah Spotlight".

This summer, the spotlight is on Savannah's new pine pieces, introduced at the April '96 market in a brand new finish.

Above is the 86-inch-tall Entertainment Armoire (103-57). Knotty pine gives the piece character, while reeded front posts, deeply carved front panels and a broken pediment top add visual interest. Truly Southern American Country at its best.

New fabrics from Greeff making the scene

Hickory White continues to add new fabrics to the Savannah line. Some of the more exciting newcomers include three exclusive patterns from Greeff which are based on actual drawings from the Savannah area.

"We are delightfully surprised with the strong sales response to the Greeff licensed fabrics," stated Gordon W. Reed, between Greeff and Hickory White," he noted.

Greeff recently completed a new wallpaper and fabric book for the design trade and our Savannah fabrics - and furniture - were featured throughout!

News from Savannah, GA

Public television's highest-rated half hour series settles into Georgia's oldest city

It is reported that visitors to Savannah currently have two questions when they arrive. One, where is the house that was in the book Midnight in the Garden of Good and Evil (the Mercer House) and two, where is the house that "This Old House" is renovating?

Well, "the house" is right across the street from the Mercer House on Monterey Square and right now, it is drawing just about as much national attention. The 112 year old, three story brick and stucco residence belongs to Mills and Marianne Fleming. "This Old House" has chosen the home for its second project of their 17th season.

The show airs at different times in different states. Check your local listing. And be sure to pick up a copy of the new spin-off publication "This Old House Magazine", for a close-up look at the Fleming home floor plans and specifications.
